Shinto Perspectives in Miyazaki's Anime Film "Spirited Away"

by James W. Boyd and Tetsuya Nishimura

Abstract

[1] Among the anime films by Hayao Miyazaki made available in English translation, Spirited Away contains the most folk and Shrine Shinto motifs.¹ The central locale of the film is a bathhouse where a great variety of creatures, including kami, come to bathe and be refreshed. This feature, plus the portrayal of various other folk beliefs and Shrine Shinto perspectives, suggests that Miyazaki is affirming some basic Japanese cultural values which can be a source of confidence and renewal for contemporary viewers.

II. Shinto Perspectives

[8] There are many folk and Shrine Shinto perspectives embedded in the cultural vocabulary of this film. The director Miyazaki explicitly acknowledges his indebtedness to this tradition. He refers, for example, to his "very warm appreciation for the various, very humble rural Shinto rituals that continue to this day throughout rural Japan"⁴ and cites the solstice rituals when villagers call forth all the local kami and invite them to bathe in their baths.⁵ This, apparently, is the inspiration for the bathhouse locale in the film, and his reference to kami invokes the essence of the Shinto tradition. A brief outline of some basic perspectives of the Shinto world view will provide an overall framework for understanding the film and various incidents and characters in it.

[9] Shrine Shinto understands the whole of life, including both humans and nature, as creative and life giving.⁶ A generative, immanent force (musubi; ki; kami-nature) harmoniously pervades the whole phenomenal world. This creative process is a continual, ongoing one, and is neither arbitrary nor deterministic. Unusual or "superior" manifestations of this generative, vital power, called kami, can be experienced as possessing an awesome presence and potency. All phenomena are candidates for this designation, e.g., the sun, moon, mountains, rivers, fields, seas, rain, wind, plants and animals, or great persons, heroes or leaders. However, to experience the kami presence of any one of these aspects of nature requires an aesthetically pure and cheerful heart/mind (kokoro), an emotional, mental and volitional condition that is not easily attained.

[10] The reason for this is that although we are grounded in this pervasive vital process, we are too often unable to connect with it. Like a mirror covered with dust, the disposition of our personality, i.e., our kokoro, becomes clouded and opaque. Just as aspects of nature can become polluted -- a river can become dirty and foul-smelling -- so also the interior conditions of the human heart and mind can lack a sense of freshness and vitality. When so polluted, we do things poorly and sloppily; our kokoro hardens and we turn in on ourselves -- the way children do when they sulk and refuse to openly and politely relate to others.

[11] Hence we need to act in such ways that we can "purify ourselves" -- wipe away the pollution. This means both to literally clean ourselves -- wash away the dirt, as well as cleanse our attitudes and cultivate a sound, pure and bright heart/mind, in order to act with genuine "sincerity" (makoto) toward others and the world. This sense of cultivating the strength of character inherent in all of us is stated succinctly in a Japanese proverb: "Both suffering and happiness depend on how we bear (carry, take firm hold of) our kokoro (kurushimu mo tanoshimu mo kokoro no mochiyō).⁷ That is, each one of us is basically in charge of our attitudes and our actions, and we can either give in to unfavorable circumstances or try to "clean up" matters and improve our situation, as difficult as that may be.

[12] This notion of learning to live with a sound, pure heart/mind is a central theme in Miyazaki's "Spirited Away," as the story depicts Chihiro's journey from being a sulking child to that of a young person who acts with genuine sincerity toward others and the world. Miyazaki portrays this spiritual transformation in a captivating way. He places Chihiro in the realm of the fantastic: the strange world of Yubāba, Haku, and the bathhouse, where she is put to the test, and through her tribulations cultivates a pure and cheerful heart which in turn enables her to help her friend Haku remember his true identity. The viewer comes to understand the story, especially in the dubbed English version of the film, principally as one of the internal character development of Chihiro. Although this theme is important, there is a great deal more to the film. Relating the film to the Shinto perspectives just noted and looking more closely at the Japanese version, one comes to understand Chihiro's character development in a relational, rather than individualistic context, and the importance of tradition for Miyazaki comes into focus.

III. An Interpretation of Spirited Away

[13] The first indication that Chihiro is about to enter a realm of the extra-ordinary is her wide-eyed glimpse of the torii, leaning against an old tree, surrounded by little house-like shrines. A torii marks a place of superior potency that can effect changes in one's life. But to benefit from the kami presences that inhabit such a place, something special is required: one must be sensitized to their presence. This can occur if one experientially moves from the mundane and everyday world, into a liminal realm. As Van Gennep and Turner have explained, in order to become something new one has to first abandon the old, move through a liminal phase that is neither here nor there (is betwixt and between), and then return -- but as one who is "re-formed" into a new persona.⁸ In the Japanese context it takes a cleansing -- a wiping away of the external and interior pollution that inhibits us, to arrive at such a fresh and dynamic condition.

[14] Like Alice in Wonderland who falls through a rabbit hole into a strange realm, or Dorothy in the Wizard of Oz who follows the yellow brick road, Chihiro together with her parents walks through a tunnel-like passage,⁹ across a dry river bed, into a realm characterized by disorientation, ambiguity and a sense of otherness. For an engaged audience, the film itself, through its own artistry, can effect a sense of disorientation and liminal space.

[15] The Japanese title of the film explicitly indicates this liminal realm. The last phrase in the title Sen to Chihiro no kami-kakushi literally means "something hidden by kami." There is the expression in Japanese kami-kakushi ni au (to experience kami-kakushi) which refers to the folk designation of incidents when someone is inexplicably missing for some time. If and when that person returns -- and whether or not that person remembers being gone -- people say that that person has been "hidden by the kami." Chihiro's parents do not remember being gone; upon returning to their car they find it inexplicably covered with leaves and dust. But Chihiro herself does remember her transforming journey into a realm of the kami.

[16] With fanciful insight, Miyazaki conveys to us how diverse and strange the myriad of kami (yaoyorozu no kami) can be.¹⁰ There is the young boy named Haku who, like the other river kami we will mention shortly, is, in his pure form, a white river dragon. Chihiro also encounters kami of animals and vegetation, such as small baby chicks and a white sumo-like radish kami, reflections of the Shinto notion that all phenomena have kami potential. Miyazaki himself refers to this idea: "In my grandparents' time," he says, "it was believed that spirits [kami] existed everywhere -- in trees, rivers, insects, wells, anything. My generation does not believe this, but I like the idea that we should all treasure everything because spirits might exist there, and we should treasure everything because there is a kind of life to everything."¹¹

[17] Being true to the Shinto insight that all phenomena often become polluted and are in need of cleansing and purification in order to manifest their vitality, Miyazaki has this strange array of creatures come to the bathhouse to be restored to their original freshness. This is made especially vivid when a "stink spirit" -- actually the kami (or nushi) of a badly polluted and smelly river, is cleansed of all sorts of trash including an old bicycle.¹² Once refreshed, the river's mask-like visage says to Sen "It feels good" (English version: "Well done;" cf. below). Sen sees the true nature of this river kami through the purifying waters -- at that moment her kokoro is clean and bright and she witnesses the forceful dragon-like river kami sail away white and pure.

[18] Among the various other ghost-like creatures in the film are the wandering souls of dead persons who appear in this world due to past regrets or worries.¹³ But a more haunting figure in the film is the "No Face" image (kao nashi). He likely represents the type of person who has little interest in things, is gloomy and melancholy, and subject to morbid introspection. As one whose energy [ki] is inki, i.e. one whose heart is closed (kokoro o tojiru),¹⁴ he has a voracious self-centered appetite. But No Face is lonely and unsuccessfully seeks Chihiro's friendship by offering her the semblance of shining gold nuggets. Her polite refusal to accept the "gold," however, turns No Face into a terrifying menace to everyone in the bathhouse.

[19] But No Face is not a fixed figure of evil. Toward the end of the film he begins to learn from Yubāba's twin sister Zenība how to improve his attitude and act with genuine "sincerity" (makoto) toward others, as he makes an effort to help "Granny" spin thread and knit a friendship hairband to protect Chihiro.

[20] The kind of moral ambivalence we find in No Face is also true of Yubāba: sometimes fearsome with her ferocious anger, yet also capable of an affectionate spoiling of her child. Furthermore, Zenība, who is friendly to Chihiro and is encouraging to No Face, is Yubāba's identical twin. As such they represent a mixture of both bad and good encounters experienced by Chihiro -- encounters that at times diminish and at other times promote Chihiro's confidence.

[21] In other words, from a Shinto perspective Yubāba and Zenība do not represent fixed opposites of good versus evil as you might find in films such as "The Lord of the Rings." Rather, these crone figures and No Face reflect a Shinto ethical outlook that views events in one's life as either reducing (polluting) or promoting (purifying) one's ability to participate fully in the life energy that permeates all of Great Nature.¹⁵ When the polluted river (the stink spirit) is cleansed, its mask-like visage says to Chihiro through the clear waters "It feels good." That is, it has returned to its natural powerful freshness that characterizes all phenomena. In the English version the kami of the river says "Well done," making it a moral compliment regarding Chihiro's good deed -- not an affirmation of the river's natural state of purity so necessary to promote life.¹⁶

[22] At the climax of the film Chihiro remembers an incident when she lost a pink shoe in a river and almost drowned trying to retrieve it, but was carried by the water's current to the safety of the shore. She comes to the realization that the river was the Kohaku river, and that this is Haku's true name -- an identity which he could not remember because the river had been filled in and covered with buildings (likely Miyazaki's critique of the over-building in Japan at the expense of nature). In that moment when she explains this to Haku -- now in the form of a white river dragon -- he remembers his name, and both he and Chihiro look at each other with sparkling, luminous eyes.

[23] As Victor Turner notes, there can be moments in the liminal experience of deep reciprocal encounters between persons or places, i.e. a deep sense of mutual relation (an I-Thou) between persons or with nature. Miyazaki is possibly portraying Chihiro as being in a genuine, authentic relation with the kami presence of the Kohaku river. In Shinto terms, such an occasion is called shinjin-gouitsu, a "uniting of kami with the human spirit," which occurs only when one approaches the other with the "sincerity and purity of one's heart" (makoto no kokoro). It was as a result of Chihiro's transformative journey through a liminal world that both she and Haku came to know their true identity - an identity of authentic relationship -- thus coming to know their real names.¹⁷

[24] The character Haku is in some respects the embodiment of what we are calling traditional Japanese cultural values. His attire resembles that of the Heian period -- he wears something similar to a hakama, part of a Shinto priest's formal costume. Besides this courtly dress, his speech is formal and traditional. When he refers to himself, he does not use the more colloquial "boku" but the more formal "watashi." And when he addresses Sen, he uses the ancient, more noble aristocratic term "sonata." In fact, Haku's full name, nigihayami kohaku-nushi, is reminiscent of a reference in the Kojiki (the oldest extant book in Japanese), "nigi haya hi no mikoto" the name of an ancestor to one of the families of high courtly rank in ancient times.¹⁸

[25] The fact that Haku embodies certain traditional values, that he is the one who helps Chihiro in the transitional world, and that Chihiro in turn helps Haku remember his identity, invites interpretation. Perhaps Miyazaki is affirming to contemporary viewers of this anime film some important insights in the Shinto Japanese tradition (represented by Haku) that can be helpful in these modern times. For example, Miyazaki conveys his perspective that there is "a kind of life to everything" and that certain customs such as cleansing both the external environment and one's internal kokoro from pollution are practices to be reaffirmed. Likewise, Chihiro's contribution to Haku's sense of identity suggests that those of us in the contemporary world who are "inquiring after many things" (Chihiro) can assess and critique our inherited traditions and reappropriate those values that have been forgotten or covered over the way the Kohaku river had been. Just as Chihiro recognizes her parents at the end of the film, so also Miyazaki's film asserts that there are some basic Japanese cultural values that need to be re-cognized as valuable insights in life's journey. It is our interpretation that Miyazaki is reaffirming aspects of the Japanese tradition preserved in Shinto thought and practice that can serve as transformative sources of confidence and renewal for both the young and old.
